Coronado and the Seven Cities of Cíbola

Essential Question

Who were the first European explorers of New Mexico and what were their motivations? What did they discover and what were the consequences of their actions?

This lesson will introduce students to the Coronado Expedition of 1540-1542, the first large-scale expedition to explore the terrain and peoples of what is today New Mexico.

Objectives

After completing this lesson, students will be able to:

1. Describe the motivations of the Coronado Expedition.
2. Trace the Coronado Expedition’s geographical and chronological route.
3. Explain how and why the conflicts between the Expedition and native peoples arose.

Background

The 16th-century Spanish explorer Francisco Vázquez de Coronado (c. 1510-1554) was serving as governor of an important province in New Spain (Mexico) when he heard reports of the so-called Seven Golden Cities located to the north. In 1540, Coronado led a major Spanish expedition up Mexico’s western coast and into the region that is now the southwestern United States. Though the explorers found none of the storied treasure, they did discover the Grand Canyon and other major physical landmarks of the region, and clashed violently with local Indians. With his expedition labeled a failure by Spanish colonial authorities, Coronado returned to Mexico, where he died in 1554.
